Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow:

We don't eat food only to tickle our taste buds, but also to get nutrients for running our body, making it grow and repairing the inevitable wear and tear. The food that we eat contains these nutrients, but these have to be extracted by the digestive system through a complex biochemical process.

Unless it is properly digested, the food that we eat is not of much use to us.

All food must be suitably broken down before it can be absorbed into the blood stream. Contrary to popular belief, digestion does not start in the stomach but in the mouth itself. The elaborate process is carried out by the amazing system in the human body that mixes nearly eight litres of various chemicals and enzymes in our food. Ironically, wrongly eaten food first causes stress and then this stress further hampers the digestive process. Thus, a vicious cycle starts with one problem aggravating the other. How our stomach and intestine behave is beyond our control, But we can certainly control what happens in our mouth.
